Whole Country Pays Honor to Thomas Edison

Today is Anniversary of His Invention of Incandescent Light

Today for the first time the civilized world does honor to the benefits conferred upon it by Thomas A. Edison. It is the forty-seventh anniversary of his invention of the incandescent light, which marked the beginning of the electric era which has revolutionized every form of human endeavor. For some years past Edison Day, Oct. 21, has been celebrated in the United States, but the achievements of Edison belong to no nation, and this year Edison Day has taken its place on the calendar of every nation in the world.

In keeping with the quiet, thoughtful, industrious, persevering spirit of the "Wizard of Menlo Park," this celebration of Edison Day is not spectacular or boisterous. On the contrary, the great international program that is being enacted today is calculated to stimulate thoughtful interest in the marvelous benefits with which one magnificent mind has endowed humanity. In less than one-half a century the achievements of Thomas Alva Edison have revolutionized illumination, introduced electricity as the power for perhaps 75 percent of the industry of the world, and have increased agricultural production and the food supply of the world to an extent that can scarcely be calculated.

Helps Whole World
 In lifting the burden of drudgery from the housewife, the toiler, the mechanic, the laborer, and the farmer, and placing at the command of every man, woman and child innumerable slaves who do their tasks at the pushing of the push-button, Mr. Edison is the pioneer in the greatest achievements the race has ever scored in a new generation. As the sun makes its orbit of the globe today the story of how Edison on Oct. 21, 1879, found that a little loop of carbonized cotton, sewing-thread, slipped in an air-excluded glass globe and connected to an electric circuit would burn brightly and would throw a brilliant light. Today it is the only rival of the sun.

Hundreds of broadcasting stations in the United States, Hawaii, South Africa, Porto Rico, Argentine, Italy, England, Cuba, Japan, and many other countries are presenting feature programs sponsored by leaders in the electric industry.

Ballard To Speak
 In Southern California R. H. Ballard, executive vice-president and general manager of the Southern California Edison Company and former president of the National Electric Light Association, whose life has been interwoven with the practical application of electricity to the affairs of man and whose work has been recognized by a number of scientific institutions, has been selected to broadcast the tribute of the great Southwest—the most intensified electric region on earth—in its homage to Edison. Dealing with this subject in an almost elemental treatment, Mr. Ballard traces the ever-increasing use of the electric current that carefully records almost every activity of modern life, and makes the subject of this comprehensive review "Reading the Meter of Progress on Edison Day."

PHILOGRAPH

When I have stood on my pink feet all they feel tired and sore, and they ache so I cannot bear to have them touch the floor, I do not growl and do not weep and all my griefs display. I tuck my little toes up and lay them both away, and then I chortle songs of joy and gobs of gladness spread, for when my two feet ache me I can stand upon my head.

No Boy Scout Ever in L. A. Jail, Asserts Traeger in Crime Talk

Inaugurating a policy of preventing crime by educating the younger generation, Sheriff William I. Traeger has arranged for lectures to be delivered by members of the sheriff's office to the 13,000 Boy Scouts in Los Angeles, the lectures to be delivered at each troop's headquarters.

"There never has been a Boy Scout in the county jail," says Sheriff Traeger. "This fact is more significant when we consider that 19 percent of all people placed in the county jail are 21 years of age."

Amplifying this, Sheriff Traeger points out that the right principles inculcated when boys are in their teens is of more importance than all the crime correction ever worked out. "Here the old saying, 'An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure,' has its truest application," he says.

"The Boy Scouts of America are deserving of every recognition and support, for the youth of tender age learning the clean, useful and intensely interesting things a Boy Scout learns cannot help but grow up into a fine, upstanding citizen."
